

MANAGING YOUR ELECTRICAL TESTING PROGRAMME AND UNDERSTANDING DOCUMENTATION

LIVE ONLINE | 9TH MARCH 2027

This half-day information filled training session is aimed at colleagues operating within the social housing sector at any level, including customer contact staff, maintenance and property colleagues and anyone who requires a good level of non-technical awareness training.

Covering all aspects including landlord obligations in respect of electrical safety, particularly in domestic premises, the most up-to-date Regulations and Standards including smoke and heat detection systems, along with an overview of common issues in electrical safety, this session provides sufficient information to give colleagues the confidence to identify and act upon situations that may arise as part of the electrical testing programme.

The session will also cover the key aspects that colleagues should be checking when they receive documentation and records from their electrical contractors, including EICR's, EIC's and MEIWC's.

This training session provides all of the information to enable you to get a good level of non-technical awareness training, delivered by our electrical specialist associate; it provides:

- Stats – why electrical safety is important – deaths, injuries and fires
- Legislation and social landlord obligations and responsibilities, including for Scotland
- Approved codes of practice and guidance that set out testing requirements
- Professional body memberships – who's who and what does it all mean?
- A look at the different electrical records (EICR, EIC, MEIWC) and what their purpose is
- An overview of the sections contained within the EICR from a non-technical perspective to be able to confidently interpret the content of such documents
- Observation codes (C1, C2, FI and C3) – what do they mean and what should I be doing when I see one on an EICR?
- The importance of recommending appropriate action when a fault is identified and the timescale recommendations
- What to check when you receive completed records from your contractor
